"The literacy is a condition sine qua non of this manifold change, even in terms of the inventive one and the economical competitiveness of a country. There is no possibility to teach the Africans to read and write without resorting to the original languages of each people. Resorting to the original languages, is possible the total literacy reaching in the medium term. Consequently, it would be necessary engage the civil society and politics, which it would allow us to release of a shameful nuisance like the illiteracy and to put an end once and for all to this connivance. We must fight to this principle, because the use of the African languages restores, contemporarily, the dignity of the farmer. Farmers are plunged in an inferiority complex, since everyone talk to them in a foreign language. With the register of the African languages, the peasants would arise as an elite rather than those that have been dragging in the rear. It's a psychological approach that would satisfy even the young farmers, enhancing a culture where they are at ease as a fish in water ..." (Joseph Ki Zerbo - burkinabé historian)
